

Autoethnographic Poetry: After the End

Description

“I have become helpless with the thought that writing cannot save anyone.” (Yoo, 2021, p. 194)

They find words
among the rusty cans in an abandoned parking lot They mix them with the sand with yesterday's leftovers dreams memories
faded photographs
which refer to nothing scattered signs

which for a moment give the illusion of satiety gnashing between teeth and have a sour aftertaste

Znajduj? s?owa
w?ród zardzewia?ych puszek na opuszczonym parkingu mieszaj? je z piaskiem wczorajszymi resztkami
snów wspomnie?
wyblak?ych zdj??
które do niczego nie odnosz? rozsypane znaki
na chwil? daj?ce z?udzenie syto?ci zgrzytaj? mi?dzy z?bami i maj? kwa?ny posmak

References

Yoo, J. (2021). Writing as inquiry during a pandemic. Cultural Studies ? Critical Methodologies, 21(2), 194–197. <https://doi.org/10.1177/1532708620965573>

AUTHOR'S MEMO

This autoethnographic poem is a question about the power of autoethnography in the face of the climate crisis. It is an expression of my dark fears, my depression that keeps me away from writing. A climate crisis asks about the meaning of writing. How can we by writing – autoethnography – stop the coming change? To what extent can we transform the apocalypse into the utopia that is (non)coming? How useful will our writing be after the apocalypse? To what extent will our fears, desires, and hopes be understandable to people who survive the crisis?

The autoethnographic poem is written in English and Polish to counteract the hegemony of the English language and to minimize the loss of meaning in translation. More from the author:

Chutorański, M. & Szwabowski, O. (in press). From the semi-periphery with love. A dream of democratic social science: a margins lever. Journal of Studies in International Education, DOI:10.1177/10283153211070109

Featured image by Helen Cramer on Unsplash

Category

1. All Content
2. Autoethnographic Poetry
3. Climate Change Special Issue, 2022

Author

oskar-szwabowski