Bodily Autonomy Special Issue: Poems for an Intimate Secret

Author's Memo

My abortion is an intimate secret, something for me to save me, but in this patriarchal hall of mirrors, this choice is distorted into a public spectacle. My poems for this special issue seek to document a history of my choice, not just personally but humanly, to use autoethnography to weave through the personal and the political, the body I'm in, the landscape I'm in, the time I'm in.

Throughout my pregnancy, I hungered for a voice of kinship, proof that I was not alone in the hatred of my strange, bulging body. I looked for pregnancy poems that demonstrated my confusion and revulsion, finding nothing. Violence that I never knew was in me swelled in my head; sometimes all I could do was scream something primitive and thrash around and hit myself. My ADHD worsened. I had to take incompletes from school as my brain was exploding constantly. I had only met my partner less than six months prior to the pregnancy, and I found myself resenting him for having a penis, resenting my body for taking the peace I had found with him, within myself in those few months. His guilt and mental illness festered and often we were mad together. We fought a lot, but we also sought to reach towards each other with compassion. Our bond deepened, and we are still together and in love today.

I tried ending my pregnancy outside conventional means as Planned Parenthood was very dismissive when I tried to speak, gasp my truth in my autistic/ adhd selective mutism/ word vomit. They told me they couldn't help me. They were shut down because of the pandemic and wouldn't be open until June. I didn't know that there were other clinics until my wonderful gynecologist began referring me to places months later. I ordered pills online from Access Aid first, but due to the horrific COVID outbreak in India and Bill Gates patenting and limiting reproduction of vaccines, which Indian pharmacists helped design, the pills came very late and heartbreakingly failed.

While I waited, I tried Vitamin C. I ran away with the pennyroyal I had bought as a teenager following sexual assault experiences. I swam and swam until I sunk. I contacted adoption agencies only to be rejected by the discriminatory parents (I suspect that it may be due to the mental health, neurological, and biraciality of the possible child inside me, information I gave to the adoption agency). I watched documentaries, did research, uncovered that link between abortifacients and midwifery throughout the world, inspiring "Living Before it Quickens", examining how Christian patriarchal medicalization of the female body put an end to abortion access and how White supremacy permeated with its destructive and appropriating tendencies, literally stealing POC bodies. This then limited access to Indigenous women's body autonomy, denying their use of abortifacient herbs like Blue Cohosh as mere wanton mysticism. There was truth here. Just as there was truth in the tender assertion of cotton root for enslaved Black women, one of the few ways that they could liberate themselves. Ancient Chinese women too claimed their bodies as their own using Don Quai. Though herbal abortifacients are much riskier than today's medical and surgical abortions, they still hold validity and may require pharmaceutical consideration. These herbs were an attempt to define one's own body; this history needs to be treasured rather than ignored.

And who knows? We might be going back to these older remedies. In my poems, I wish to show that desperation seeks resolution. "Serenity Prayer for a Miscarriage" may be what many uterus owners have to experience now, this tireless and dangerous pursuit of the deadly miscarriage to put an end to this process that is sucking the clarity, meaning, and vitality from the person who would choose an abortion. People are going to die from these oppressive laws, actual people living in this world, people who have made connections, found love, who have hope for a better tomorrow, who want more than anything to build something for themselves and maybe the world too. People are going to die, and this risk increases for Black and Indigenous uterus owners and sexually abused children.

As a White woman, though my neurodivergence acted as a barrier to access and being taken seriously, I know it would be easier. I was so lucky to get pregnant when I did. My abortion officially took place two months before the Texas Heartbeat Bill went into effect. I was 19.5 weeks pregnant and 24 years old. I am so grateful for the love and gentleness I received at the Southwestern Women's Surgery Center. I would not be in this world without them.

I would have likely killed myself to escape that pregnancy.

Every person who has an abortion has their own story, but they all, if the choice was made fully and freely as their own, exhibited the courage of decisiveness. As a very indecisive person, being pregnant forced me to confront my body, to accept that I was actually in a body rather than just floating around in space. I could not ignore it. I could not procrastinate. I was trapped, but Roe gave me a key. It gave me a way out of that prison, and I am so fucking grateful.

Now though so many people are trapped in their bodies as if they were part of no transformation at all, as if they never possessed a history, as if limits, a ceiling that is reached at the womb, is all there ever was. My poems seek truth, an honest rebellion, evidence of a human being who makes decisions for their own body, that this is a thoughtful and deeply personal decision, one made for the self and with the self, a remedy, my goddess, a remedy.

Living Before It Quickens

Dedicated to the Southwestern Women's Surgery Center

The earth has a solution for everything.

Blue cohosh, birthwort, angelica: the makers of angels. The unwanted dragged out, blood and flesh, a transplanted pentacle from the body composing it. I am not ready to be cut open.

My disrupted humors: phlegm and melancholy assume my visage from the tomb that grows inside me. Destiny says it does not have to overtake. Because when all that I carry is mud in my basket and don't know enough magic to turn mud into homunculi and don't want to repeat the mud I was made in, abortion is the only loving action left.

Pennyroyal, Don Quai, cotton root: I must survive the flea buried within. The mouth drinking the organ tea. The womb reprieved by elasticity. The self rejuvenating like a bottle of ipecac. I am responsible for the only circle I have. What comes out will leave a little more room for me.

The midwife calls, frees me from that gelatinous opposition, and the priest accepts my penance.

Who declares my savior a witch?

Serenity Prayer for Inducing a Miscarriage

If you were me, you'd want it gone too, want all the blue to make it empty. You are no match for the sky: life jacket against infinity. Undriven, unable to drive, ungraduated, unemployed, unmarried, unhealthy, unstable, unwilling to destroy the life of that partner still seeing you as capable. In the future, in a world cleansed of capitalism, in surround sound citadels where dreams and community and universal design meet, maybe. But everything body is now. The pool water ripples. You are in a stew. Some may say you are baking. The water though doesn't stop reminding you of your impact, halos blurring the belly bulge—that uncracked egg somehow spewing yellow yoke. You have to pee again. You feel the sweet urge to take off your swimsuit and show the world your captivity, bouncing from building to building with the growing gravity you want to smash, leaving a stream of pee & cloudy discharge. You want to be found. Really though, you are blue & breathless, unbaked for loving, hurdling away from goo goo hungers like a wind-up doll with marching arms, the movement equal to not moving, or like the dead snake, stale on the surface, eyes blank & egoless, not fear but the wish to return to something after. The leftover blueberries won't fit in the cooler. They tumble into the pool. We live in a house of neglect. All that you have been named—ADHD, Bipolar, PMDD, Autism, Slut, Victim, Failure—pours, no overflows into motion. The sky's powder turns the doorknob. You want to be made uninhabitable. In your mind, you crumple the paper moon inside you like a tesseract, fold this time away as simply skipped. You swim a lap, body ripping into body ripping into nobody; then another and another. You won't stop until something comes out. You are in control. You have become water and everything else.

Exorcism is Goodbye

I need you to understand:

it is not about who possesses what.

It's about not being able to handle what's growing inside. The truth is:
I wanted you and didn't want you.

You, AKA It, AKA Uncreature, expanded from me like a luminescent tumor, placenta splintering my ability to speak or be seen as separate. I went to a place called Women's Crisis Center, thinking this was for me: I am indeed in crisis.
I had already tried running away twice to escape my body. R. had to drive around for hours trying to find me.

He went with me to that "clinic" to confront the unnamable: Progesterone Poisoner,
crackhead chicken, unalive, dancing under the influence of my body, my Vyvanse, my rainbow Nerds.

They tugged me into a room, him into another, filled my hands with pamphlets and shame, him with doubts he deleted: do you even want to be with her? Here, we're not the focus. Here, adjectives and nouns spin into smoothie. "I" scattered only vehicular in the gel-splattered wand, turning me inside out on that screen of moving un-feet.

I am no mother. I'm no murderer either.
I still mourn possibility: the ants I killed or watched die. I vow to limit destruction.
How can I though take the breath of what has not breathed? What would I teach except an inheritance of screams?

It was made with love and tender impulsivity, but our ADHD didn't plan for all the rogue endings. You are potential for my impotential.

The disgrace I release for future grace, but really it's about you too.

There are too many sharp things in our world for you right now, Bubble Buddy. Too much Papa must pop.

Mama must morph. Get into shape for you.

I must leave you.

You must leave,

so I have something left.

Little mango,

with love from not-mom and not-dad, I squeeze you out.

Birthplace of Yama

When the pills fail, my doctor holds me, calls clinics as I lay belly-up surrounded by candles, rocks in the palms, warmed sonogram gel unable to cure this rejection: birth, adoption, abortion.

It is all too loud for me.
Too much. Too disabled, too poor, too mad, too

The AutoEthnographer

body. The due date is my destruction, the stabbed point between love and what I refuse to define me. Koan, carry me to relief: what is my face before I am born. I'm supposed to

ponder, but I'm running out of time. I hide my face from the screen. A bleat of unbeing bleeding out potentials, shriveling so many branches for the sake of one obfuscating direction.

I am already the riddle: the body divisible, dwarfed, anchorless, by the unhatched. What if, before I was born, my body, these dualized lips, breasts, ovaries, were defaced as divided? This is the trauma: the leap from innocence into scrutiny. Symbiont free of

The AutoEthnographer

memory, do I owe you an apology, an explanation, a goodnight kiss as I trim this branch for the sake of all the others, for the part of me that is unquenched to survive? I don't forget you. I forgo you. I, the face, before and after those unrealized hands.

Subterranean Survival

You have run away, the tent exhales you, the mosquitos bite your thighs and you let them.
It's easier to just let them drink and suck up their abuses until serotonin tells you to scratch.
Cicadas, however, would make music in your palm.
Five years underground and they rid themselves of the belief that skin is memory, that what happens in the body stays in the body.
They surface, they cling, they hatch with a ribbed xylophone belly. You wonder if there is a bully in them that remembers burial, or do they just lock onto love upon waking, embracing telegraphy? You have run away, only to sit and listen to the cicada's rub. You said nothing; silence is not affirmation. Consent does not begin with refusal.

You were just there, struggling with being a sexed-up knot against the wall, lips like abandoned exoskeleton. You suck in.
Their Morse mouths moan old origins and lost hardnesses as they accept their shedding. You want to stay soft. That cage of the body independent of its mysteries, trade it for songs, for touch, for recovery of evolution.
Dust off the carcass hitched to a tree until you're no longer wrong, until you realize you don't deserve to be bitten after all.
