A Simple Text, A Complex Reckoning: On Sisters and Queers

Author's Memo

Written in the conversational spirit of Frank O'Hara, this poem is based on text messages between me and my sister. It is a reckoning on sisters and queers after themes of family violence, sibling disconnection and queer isolation emerge. Initially flippant, the tone is consistent with the simplicity of my sister's first text message, but as emotions escalate, intensity builds to create a stream of consciousness effect.

'Initially flippant, the tone is consistent with the simplicity of my sister's first text message, but as emotions escalate, intensity builds to create a stream of consciousness effect.'

As autoethnography, my subjective voice situates my work in an Australian cultural context through an ironic reference to the TV soap Neighbours, famous for its catchy theme song that applauded middle class neighbours supporting one another, as opposed to middle class families hiding violence behind closed doors with their desperate queer kids struggling with their identity. Growing up in this cultural context is further emphasised by my reference to the Australian actor Nicole Kidman. Though I infer we are of the same ilk by fondly calling her 'our Nic,' it is only our age that is similar. She is a model of heteronormativity. My alliance with her is a symptom of the ongoing lack of mainstream queer role models, which contributes to ongoing internalised homophobia.

'It is a reckoning on sisters and queers after themes of family violence, sibling disconnection and queer isolation emerge.

My sister and I were divided through the fear, silence, secrecy, and shame that family violence creates. Our parent's conflict did not strengthen our bond as we each had our own ways of reacting, and as an adult, she moved overseas. As the sister who stayed close to our mother, I suffered a deep major depression after our mother's death. My mother's vulnerability led to a mutual dependency and without her I was unmoored. The time after our parents' death was also marked by increased conflict between my sister and me. It was as if we were trying to continue to assert our position as favourite child, as if we were unaware the contest had always been futile, as if our sibling rivalry was a game we could never win.

By not growing up as allies, my sister and I never developed the capacity to freely discuss my queer identity. Now, we do not tend to talk of intimate matters. Perhaps we are too burdened with misplaced shame and secrecy from family violence, or too distrustful of each other from the destructive competitiveness of our dysfunctional family dynamics.

When I refer to another Nicole Kidman movie and accuse my sister of dripping 'easy beige Stepford happiness,' I am expressing frustration that she lives an uncomplicated heteronormative life. Even if this is not true, she leads me to believe it from her sunny disposition and from her failure to ask about my queer experience. As sisters, how are we to wrestle our legacies? How do we talk about the queer non-acceptance, prejudice, and problematic stereotypes we grew up with? And the turning away that has led to my isolation? The universality of having coffee is no doubt a start.

'The time after our parents' death was also marked by increased conflict between my sister and me. It was as if we were trying to continue to assert our position as favourite child, as if we were unaware the contest had always been futile, as if our sibling rivalry was a game we could never win.

It's late Friday night and I've stayed in on my own to eat cheese on toast and watch our Nic in 'Being the Ricardos'

I'm flanked by three dogs and two cats on the leather sofa (bought in my aspirational acquisition phase) an aesthetically pleasing item of furniture, but not so comfortable for the six of us all and I'm thinking about how much love I have for these beasts of mine though Robbie, my big Border Collie is farting like he dined on Souvlakis when your text comes through announcing your visit next March, or maybe April will I be around?
can we do coffee?
and as the gastric acid rises from my stomach to forewarn me I'll not sleep tonight because of my head, my head, my head having to thrash about all you are no – all you and me and we are not all we have messed up concepts I'm less clear on since our parents died and took their chaos with them so I reply with a 'sure I'll be around and coffee would be great' while hoping I'll be saved by another pandemic eek! what fool of monster could think such a thing?

if our mother was still alive she'd give me THAT look as if I had the power to mutate Omicron to a new JEN strain THAT same look she gave if we ever let loose with a 'fuck' or a 'bloody' or a 'shit,' though we didn't learn our swear words in school remember? me on the stairs...you somewhere...I don't know where Mum didn't – I guess couldn't – censor every drama in our household we weren't Neighbours for fuck's sake though when you went to England, I bet you pretended we were I know I did but I only lasted there a year, not like you – who escaped for a lifetime not that I resented you for it...
I only wanted acknowledgement I gave into Mum's pull – her need – y'know after she died
I crumbled, lost and bereft everyone thought it was because we were so close – her and I – but after she died I lost my mirror – which is weird when she saw a different image – when she left, there was no one to reflect the boundaries of my being 'Jen's a ghost' I heard people say complicated bereavement turned into major depression turned into chronic depression turned into

time
a
dot
marked as survival
if imagined intentions don't count counted as a bonus even if the glass is only half full it's been seven years since that hearse drove off with my insides and I said 'No shit Sherlock,' to the baby-faced ED doctor who told my ECG I had broken heart syndrome I had to rest for three months – no running or cycling – strenuous exercise banned to let my poor heart heal as simple as that but it wasn't, was it?
you and I were so driven to fight the fight to take up where Mum and Dad left off our fancy words replaced their fists never saying what needed to be said to bridge our enormous gulf but now if I was to start a real conversation with you, I'd say we were raised in a way that for one of us to exist the other had to not breathe pitted against each other in a race to seek the highest favour but our playing fields were never level you, sweet pretty you, dripping your easy beige Stepford happiness and odd little me – the queer one – a mind at war with a body – I didn't share with you growing up anything truthfully like who I wanted to love and why I only wanted to wear jeans and look like the boy you teased me of being and so as we grew older it was you, who called me 'emotionally immature' instead of 'sensitive soul' and me who called you 'deserter' instead of 'survivor' and now we bury our despair with our rage

and fears imagine if we discussed all you are all you and me and we are not
