Poems As a Form of Powerful Activism and Barrier-breakers

Author's Memo

I believe poetry can be a form of activism. With an open mind, poetry also allows us to break down barriers in society. When we dive deep into the realm of poetry, this allows for a deeper understanding of the human condition, and an exploration of human emotions. Here we can learn from different life stories and perspectives from unique voices to further foster compassion and empathy. This intersectionality of me identifying as a poet, mental health advocate, and also as a gay woman living with an invisible disability of bipolar disorder 1, can bring forth harmful labels that I refute. For example, people could perceive me as the stereotype "tortured artist". I've been asked stereotypical questions that could perpetuate this. I am actively challenging the "tortured artist" stereotype. During a Question and Answer session following the reading of my poetry book: Farewell Clay Dove (UnCollected Press, 2021) I was asked: "In what state are you the most creative?". This question had the undertones of suggesting that in a stable state, generating great poems is not possible, with which I disagree. In addition, this question deemphasizes the fact I work very hard at the craft of writing. Moods do not grant me poems. I am much more than just this illness; it does not define me.

'I believe poetry can be a form of activism.

Furthermore, my poem titled: "Besides, Raging Tiger, You Can't Just Go Asking for Mercy" after Kaveh Akbar was anthologized in Nasty Women's Day Anthology, created by Moonstone Arts Center. They hosted a reading of poets they published, including myself. The title of the anthology is actively taking power back by combining both “National Be Nasty Day” and “International Women’s Day” that coincided on March 8th. Taking power back was demonstrated not only by means of irony but also by being innovative and fierce. Outspoken women can be deemed “nasty” by society even though they are pushing for the rights of women. The poems were very powerful because women were actively reclaiming their voices.

‘With an open mind, poetry allows us to break down barriers in society.

Poetry is what grounds me. I also believe that in this realm of poetry I have complete control. This is ever so important to me, as an individual affected by bipolar disorder 1 for over a decade. I’m a dedicated volunteer blogger for The International Bipolar Foundation since April 2020 to the present. With poetry, I have not only control over my pen and paper, control over my word choice and direction of my poems, control over this sacred space of creativity, but also control over my complex mind. My poetry unites my body with my mind and soul, and cannot be taken away from me. Writing poetry frees me from some suffering. Poetry lets me liberate my troubling emotions, including fear. I can turn these emotions into something tangible. Words on paper are seemingly simple, but in reality very profound. Poetry is my world, and poetry means the world to me. Time and time again poetry has given me purpose and also has given me something to hold on to.

‘When we dive deep into the realm of poetry, this allows for a deeper understanding of the human condition, and an exploration of human emotions.

Spectator

The era of simplicity no longer stands as I am in the stands merely a spectator watching myself dressed and undressed.

Trying to decipher in the mirror if I somewhat resemble a man; wearing my flannel deemed “lumberjack shirt” as a joke.

As a power move, but owning no dresses, and as I dress myself, I think maybe my face; yet I don't want to admit confusion.

But when my gender gets questioned, the dominos fall, the past falls forward, not spring backwards, never feminine enough.

Yet feeling powerless. I would rather have the power a man does, but would never want to be one while women are so beautiful; their breasts.

My breasts, wishing to consensually touch another woman's breasts whereas my chest holds fear, too my lungs less air as anxiety rises.

I dislike mirrors. I hate seeing myself in photographs, and as I stand there, there is more than the physical, but distance.

Upon distance guarded upon guarded. The shield was too fierce it cracked under its own weight.
This body feels too heavy.

While this mind is trying to withstand the test of time or the wall. There's a mirror, mirrors are man-made, and I didn't make it a point.

To ponder the binaries the blurring the defining. The undefining when all I want is to embody a woman, and be with a woman saluting and unsaluting.

The mirror—check yourself before you wreck yourself a man would say versus the lemon test, however the test lies before my very own eyes.

Poetry Is My Prayer

I was the one who got away from myself running and running worn down countless pairs of running shoes, all colors over the years, if lined up this would create a rainbow running from the rainbow, too, even though “Somewhere Over The Rainbow” rang true in childhood, running myself into the ground self-hatred deemed the self as weak, laying stomach down head to the side on the red brick patio with the sun beating down on my back, beads of sweat dripping down while she’d rather want me to wear necklaces of pretty beads, but not the rainbow, no and that day, all alone the weight of the world too much to hold up the sky trying not to die if I wasn’t a poet, I dare not want to think of what would’ve happened to me, cannot be a self-fulfilling prophecy, my moral duty to live, to survive, not up to being another poet who falls, falls off the face of the planet, expectations, I don’t have the answers or a beacon of light it’s been bleak on and off like the lighthouse flashing lights for over a decade feeling weak, weeks keep going by people deem me inspirational whereas I am sometimes scared of these hands that can also work magic, a double-edged sword, my purple pen is no sword a sword is not a pen, and this leads me back to when.

Birthday Blues

I hear you, wishing to fight for you to see the “we” in welding, I wish to weld you a shield of any type tangible or intangible, we need each other not just a lone individual with that magnificent shining sword.

I have fallen for you, I wish to gift you an endless ladder to climb out from this place headspace this strife this life to the top of the world yet the world is a like a sphere, but still not quite.

The universal language you speak of, perhaps is the ocean the water yet to some the desert the sand dunes, to me, universality is seeing past someone’s façade into their heartspace their essence their art another trip around the sun, and I’m blessed to have met you, wish I could bedazzle your spirit with glitter to let your spirit shine, let your spirit breathe deeply, let the rainbow prevail instead of sorrow raining down your cheek like sweat dripping like the wax of a dying candle.

The light and dark and dark and light those shadows, birthday blues I hear you, nowhere near in your shoes, yes we do need that ladder to reach for the stars yet your eyes, when they twinkle with that shine, for poetry, they are stars to me.
